Everything is open and there is no "time where it will all be ruined". These are all nonsense predictions going on for approximately ever since the dawn of civilization. Jews do this constantly as well as they have a messianic syndrome and subconsciously hate civilization so they want it to just end.

Further, they lie to humanity that civilization ends due to "Sin", which is in general, disobedience to their decrees. Civilization however ends for more technical reasons, such as not following natural laws, the laws of the Gods, and in general, the path that life arrays in front of us, many times very evidently.

It doesn't take much brain to understand that if a civilization does not procreate to replace it's members, it will degrade or collapse. That does not have to do with the idea of a sin, but it has to do with deviant foolish and irresponsible behavior. Can civilizations end in this way? Yes, they can. Have they ended like this? They have. But they can end in a million other ways. Can we avoid these millions of other ways? We certainly can. But it takes learning, effort, and maybe even trial and error.

Civilizations end all the time, likely unpredictably, and constantly doing predictions doesn't mean anything. Also, chances are low for this and then other civilizations are born. The more advanced a civilization, the lower the chances, yet the battle of life goes on. While there is always a chance this or a million other things "could" happen, they generally don't happen.

Natural calamity might end a civilization partly or wholly, and then people rebuild. There is no vanity in all these efforts, it's the way of evolution of species. And it's also the price of having to pay for life to exist. In a sense this risk is normal; same as it's normal to have all these threats in our immediate environment all the time.

Civilization is just managing this chaos of natural life where life can end abruptly and without good reason. It's an attempt of species in alliance to master the problems of life. And that's a very good thing. The universe fights us to survive and so we must fight. It doesn't do it constantly or out of evil reasons however, it just "does".

There is no "set year" for all of this to end. And even if a part of human experience ends another one goes normally. So there is no end. Civilizations rise and fall but life keeps going and rebuilds itself. There is no final end, unless where life is all over. Then the universe will generate life again essentially in its own due course. The universe does not exact active vengeance on species, but it carries on its events, and when beings are ready, they can survive or fail at it, and life goes on.

People who say it "Ends" on a specific day are mostly just doing this all the time, are attention whoring, and they are giving doomsday prophecy for nonsense needs such as "proving Christianity" or other fears and other bullshit. When it all would end, nobody would truly know. And even then not all of it ends.

Even if life was to end tomorrow, we would have to do what we have to do. Therefore any "it's going to end" scenario is just fear and bullshit. If you also survive in a bunker with some military grade food still life won't have any meaning in there. The element of danger in life has to be approached with honesty, because this is how life is at the core level; death and danger are correlated with it.

Fear that it's all going to end is a constant carrot by the enemy religions so that people run scared all the time, including also a false aftermath of eternal hellfire when it all "finally happens". Spirituality and understanding the multidimensional aspect of the spiritual universe makes a human being understand there is more; here also in this very important earth and elsewhere. Life exists all over the universe, on the material level it's a bit more scarce and distanced. But existence will go on. There is no "definite end" and no "set amount of time".

There is no "date and time" where humanity will end. There are trying astrological and other times, fallouts, natural disasters, or likely nothing at all for thousands of years; or massive changes in climate [climate change is most a marketing hoax] that happen constantly. Still, humanity exists for what is approximately half a million years simply on this earth or more in its present form. There is not going to be an end. Life exists elsewhere, it will keep going.

The major thing our Gods try to show us is how to elevate spiritually, become formidable civilizations, but above all ascend into higher levels of consciousness to ensure our quality existence, but also survival. Zevism is not about idle fear.

Even if I knew it all ends tomorrow for me I would still do my best today; wisdom frees us from the snare of constant fear, death, and the need for an ultimate doomsday or the threat of a hellfire to advance, to behave, or to exist. In Zevism we are connected with the eternity within, even in a fleeting way, and this is a most important realization in our lives and existence.

Thank the Gods, we are given that. Let others be the ones who are constantly scared constantly of the end of death; death or an end will "eventually" arrive. We must be the ones that are constantly in respect of the miracle of life.

Lastly, this cowardly nonsense that some "spaceships" and other things will come to save us, I know these things exist, and might happen. They might indeed come and we might be that lucky in the end. I have just chosen superior faith in the Gods to not care what comes and what doesn't. I will do whatever I can in this or the other scenario. We will do what we have to do anyhow.

Any such beliefs as far as we are concerned cannot act in a form of entrapment. We are not Christians who wait for the "Second Coming". I cannot be sitting here all day in my mother's basement like a weakling waiting for anything else to come to save us or redeem anyone. That's not Christianity here.

I realized by leaving the cattle program, the real Saviors like the Gods, do preach us to believe in them but they preach also that we must save ourselves and others, by our own hand. That's what it means to save someone.

These disabling theories belong with the cowardly who "expect Jesus". Pay attention to what great fraud and hoax that is. It also highlights the weakness of these people in jewish hoaxes. We must not think like them, since we are not them.

A Zevist has not much to expect, because one has the Truth already; the Gods will come but the Gods are also here, right now, right at this moment, available, there, their knowledge is here with us, waiting for us.

We are supposed to exist, to become better, to advance, to survive, to do what is good, to add value to the existence of others today, not tomorrow. What comes, we welcome it, but we are here to exist, not to sit on a bench waiting for things to get "better" or to "end", or to "begin anew". We exist for a very good reason; we ought make use of that existence.
